The map shows that the distribution of the Todds in the rural areas of Antrim remained about the same between the 1830s and the 1860s, with a cluster along the north coast, a larger cluster around Ballyeaston/Ballyclare in the center, and a large number in Belfast (at least in the 1860s). The other trend is just a growth in the number of families due to natural growth minus the losses due to potato famine and massive emigration.

As far as DNA study, it would appear that getting samples from the far north and Carrickfergus families would tell us whether the Mary Todd Lincoln pattern of the central area exists elsewhere in Antrim as well or is a local pattern.
